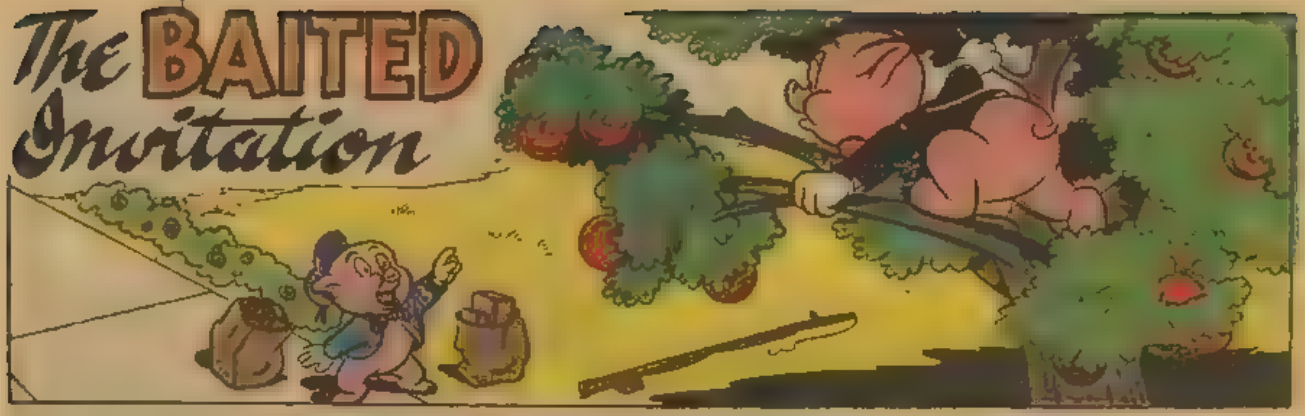
The BAITED Invitation



Porky Pig raced up the steps to Petunia's house, dragging his fishing pole behind him. "No work for me today," he thought. "I'll just eat the apple pie that Petunia said she baked for me and head for the river to get in some fishing at last."

Petunia greeted him at the door. "You certainly didn't waste any time coming for the apple pie that I promised you over the phone," she smiled.

Porky grinned. "I ran all the way, just to work up an appetite."

"Why, there was no need to do that," Petunia exclaimed. "You'll get plenty of exercise picking the apples for your pie. The Woman's Club is meeting here today, and I told them I'd bake four pies for their bazaar tomorrow. I knew you would help."

"Trapped!" Porky groaned, backing away. "Gosh, Petunia, I'd be glad to . . . but . . . "

"Now you know you don't mind helping," Petunia said, guiding him out the back door and into the yard. "Remember the last time you helped us on one of our projects. The ladies all pitched in and bought you a season ticket to the ball games to show their appreciation. Just fill those three big baskets by the tree."

Porky waited until Petunia disappeared into the kitchen and then laid down his pole and gazed up at the big apple tree.

"There goes my fishing for today," he sighed unhappily.

"Cheer up, Porky," Cicero Pig called out as he sauntered up the driveway, carrying two large grocery sacks. "You wouldn't have caught much anyway with that old-fashioned outfit of yours."

"Still, I'd have liked the chance to try," Porky grumbled. "What is in those sacks?"

Cicero grinned. "Petunia said one of us could go to the store for her and the other could pick apples. I've earned my pie by lugging these groceries home."

"You got off easy," Porky grunted. He caught one of the lower branches of the tree in both hands and swung himself up. "This is really work."

"There are more apples up higher," Cicero suggested. "And shake the branches. You'll bring more down that way."

As Porky climbed higher, Cicero pointed to a higher branch and said, "Over there; that one is loaded with apples."

Porky edged out onto the branch gingerly. "It doesn't feel very strong," he complained.

He climbed out still farther. Apples rained to the ground. Then, CRACK, the branch split and Porky tumbled into empty air.

"OWOW!" he screamed, falling KA-THUMP on top of his fishing equipment.

Cicero held up a broken fishing rod. "You broke your pole," he murmured.

Porky was about to explode in anger when the back door opened and Petunia brought out several members of the Woman's Club.

"See," Petunia cried, pointing to Porky standing beside several large piles of apples, "isn't he wonderful?"

Porky opened his mouth to tell everyone just what he thought about apple gathering, but, just then, one of the ladies handed him a package. "To show you how much we appreciate your hard work today, here is a little token of our gratitude," she beamed. "And we promise to give you time to use it, too."

Porky ripped off the wrapping and, before his eyes, a new fishing rod gleamed brightly in the sun. "Gosh," he grinned, "how could you have guessed? I'll tackle anything for you ladies, anytime."

"Fresh up" Freddie says:

"RIGHT NOW, you're probably asking yourself–

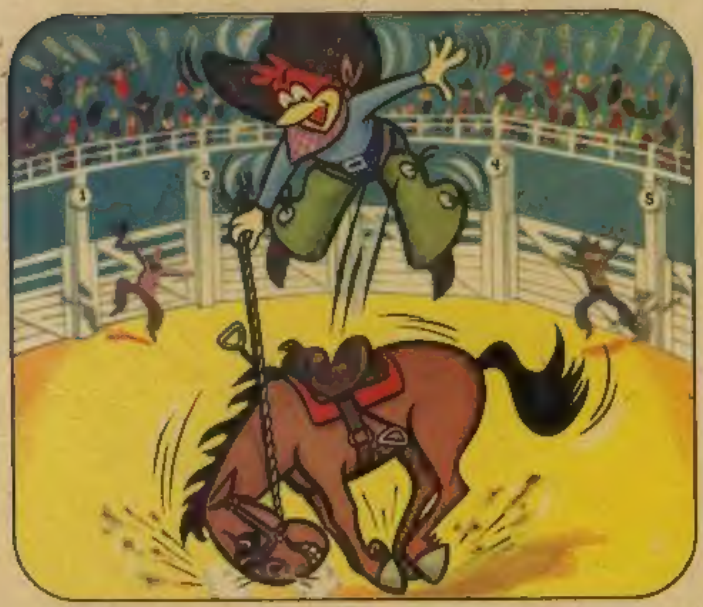
What does a bronco buster drink to quench his thirst?"

"Ah'm a rootin', tootin' bronco buster in the rodeo! Shore it's dangerous, pardner. But ah'm big 'n' strong . . . 'n' horses love me."



"Ah'm tall in the saddle . . . about ten feet taller than ah'd like to be. But this ole bronc's not leavin' me high 'n' dry. Well—at least he's not leavin' me dry."

"When ah gits down to earth, ah treats my poor ole dusty, dry throat to trusty 7-Up. That's mah favorite brand in the west (in the east, and north, and south, too)! Yippee yi yo ki yay!"
